Dear Hiring Manager,

Most candidates for financial operations roles can describe a control framework. I can tell you what it feels like at two in the morning when the night audit will not balance, and what it takes to find the missing riyal before the day officially closes. For thirteen years, that has been my work: guarding revenue at the exact points where it is most exposed.

Today I am the financial collector responsible for cash control across the branches of a specialty coffee company in Madinah — collecting daily takings, resolving cashier and POS discrepancies at the source, and monitoring branch operations by camera to support fraud detection and honest, factual investigations. Before that, I spent seven years at a resort responsible for the nightly close: rate control, account and cashier audits, cash-drawer closings, and daily revenue reconciliation, alongside managing reservations and contributing to budgets.

Two things distinguish my candidacy. The first is documented academic rigor: a Bachelor of Business Administration from Imam Mohammad Ibn Saud Islamic University, completed part-time while working full-time, with First Class Honors and a GPA of 4.83/5. The second is that I have quietly become an AI practitioner. I use large language models daily — for structured reporting, reconciliation support, and investigation write-ups — and I design workflows where AI drafts and a human verifies. I know precisely which parts of a finance operation can be safely accelerated, because I have run the manual versions myself.

I am seeking a management role where this combination — ground-truth operational knowledge, financial discipline, and practical AI capability — can improve how an organization protects and understands its money. I would welcome the opportunity to discuss what that could look like for your team.

Respectfully,

Mohammed Ali Al-Ansari
